Breaking the colonial Mindset.

Maximum of the actions that we as humans are demonstrating are to be in the favour of the powerful man. The men in power in our country are politicians, bureaucrats and other suit-and-tie officials. A drastic change in the behavioural politics of policy makers of India and their method of running the government and administrative services should be implemented. This is achievable by educating the masses and inculcating moral and ethical values in them using audio as well as visual communication.

This mentality has been hard-wired in our brains and we have to live with it. It is our duty to progress while at the same time minimise the influence of western culture. Colonial mentality has not only divided our society into various classes and social statuses, it has bound us to stray further away from our actual identity. It is always easy to put the problem on others, and as a developing country, playing a blame-game is not something the citizens should indulge in and focus on the development and empowerment of the socially destabilised and needy individuals.
